Notable Accounts

- "I just learned of all the noise surrounding Doveland, and I think I can add some insight. Doveland was a small town in Wisconsin that housed a lot of military families. My father lived there for a year or two and spoke of it occasionally. The main thing I remember is that it had to do with "Project Sanguine" in the early 60's. I don't think it was X-Files type stuff, but the town was destroyed after an incident. I thought they were digging up a ton of land for something and they flooded the town or something, but this is a rehashed secondhand memory from years ago."

- Spec. Jamie Ivanov, 12B

- "The locations for Doveland don't coincide with Project Sanguine (aka Project ELF) due to the bedrock. There are two ELF sites (no longer in operation) with one being outside of Clam Lake, WI and another in the UP; these are extremely low frequency transmitters that use the bedrock to bounce signals under the crust to signal nuclear submarines to surface to receive action messages. The antennas were above ground and look like power lines running through the middle of the forest -- if the antennas were buried then they would short out to earth ground and be useless (I'm also an amateur radio operator so this is second nature to me). There is nothing sci-fi about Sanguine and nothing that could cause an accident where a town would disappear but there have been studies about the possible increase in cancer due to the power and frequencies used at these sites."

- Nate Allen[9]

- "As someone who has lived in various places in Wisconsin for over 30 years and has been in the Army, never once has any single person ever mentioned Doveland."
- "I think you make a good point, but Doveland was very real. My father used to mention it occasionally before he passed, and the only reason I remember it is because I found it ironic that a town named "Doveland" was populated by almost exclusively military personnel and their families. I will dig around for a shirt when back home next in early September. If I remember correctly, the town was built as part of "Project Sanguine" in the mid to late 60's. Maybe everyone left when the project was cancelled, but I thought something went very wrong. You can only dig up that much turf for so long before you're bound to have problems."[10]
- "[The] freaky bit is how many people in my familly, from wisconsin, say they remember doveland."[11]

| v · e · d | Locations | [Expand] |
|---|---|---|
| v · e · d | North America | [Expand] |